

Swiss Sculpture since 1945

12 June – 26 September 2021
Aargauer Kunsthaus, Aarau

The exhibition at the Aargauer Kunsthaus presents a survey of the diverse forms of sculptural production in Switzerland from 1945 to the present. 230 works by 150 artists from all over the country can be discovered along the exciting exhibition route which starts inside the museum and leads via the roof terrace to the adjacent Rathausgarten. Tradition, avant-garde, postmodernism: The recent history of Swiss art unfurled here is characterised by innovation, diversity and close ties to the international art scene.

Unlike a painting, a sculpture appears first of all as a real object. We enter into a spatial relationship with it; the encounter becomes an experience. Not surprisingly, recent art criticism has attached particular importance to this immediacy: Sculpture is seen more than ever as a supreme discipline of art.

Nowadays, the concept of sculpture is defined very broadly. The exhibition reflects the wide array of forms of expression, yet it also meets expectations by presenting sculptural works which have become classics of the art form: bronze figures by Alberto Giacometti which throw us back onto our fragile existence; the geometric bodies of Max Bill; and the kinetic junk machines of Jean Tinguely. But we also encounter the shapeless groping bags of Doris Stauffer and the polyester aliens of the Academy Award winner H.R. Giger. Beyond the classical media, Dieter Roth's slowly rotting self-portrait cast in chocolate comments on the transience of art and life, while Pipilotti Rist's video footage projected onto objects and the party horn concert arranged by Delphine Reist blur the boundaries with other disciplines.

The comprehensive exhibition at the Aargauer Kunsthause focuses on Swiss sculpture from 1945 to the present and features 230 works by 150 artists from all over the country. Starting out from leading artists of the immediate post-war era such as Jean Arp, Max Bill, Alberto Giacometti and Germaine Richier, as well as "traditionalists" like Karl Geiser and Remo Rossi who at the time still largely dominated the Swiss art scene, the exhibition leads on to the manifold artistic trends of the 1960s. The work of a Walter Bodmer or Bernhard Luginbühl laid the foundation for – and continues to influence – the still ongoing Swiss iron sculpture movement. At the same time, new avant-gardes emerged, including Nouveau Réalisme with its protagonists Jean Tinguely, Niki de Saint Phalle, André Thomkins and its intertwining with the Fluxus movement (think of Dieter Roth and Daniel Spoerri). In the 1970s, the plurality of styles further increased. Construction, abstraction, dematerialised concept, or expressivity and inwardness: anything was possible now, to the point that everyday life found its way into art, culminating in the 1980s and conquering the international art scene, with Fischli/Weiss as the most prominent pioneers. Among the youngest generations two different attitudes or approaches can be observed: on the one hand the (postmodern) creative drive born from the liberating realization that all forms of sculpture have already been around before; and on the other the renewed interest in the material and its handcrafting. What connects them is the artists' awareness of their contribution towards a deeper understanding of our diverse, complex and even contradictory world.

The exhibition route follows a loose chronology, but frequently pauses to examine certain forms of expression, materials or subjects through arranged adjacencies. This is certain to involve some rediscoveries. A special spatial layout transforms Herzog & de Meuron's 2003 extension into a light-flooded "sculpture hall": the works installed here interact with one another, with the exhibition space and with the audience. The interplay of sculpture and surroundings changes once again with the passage from interior to exterior: additional exhibits can be discovered in the museum's foyer, and twenty-four works are installed outdoors, from the museum terrace to the furthest corners of the adjacent Rathausgarten.

Publication

The exhibition is accompanied by a publication which outlines the range of subjects of sculpture in Switzerland. Essays by well-known authors highlight issues of art geography and art historical aspects, while also examining the production conditions and the specific reception aesthetics of sculpture. A well-developed reproduction and illustration layout enriches the publication.
